

September 25, 2014

MTA Turning Acres Above Hudson Yards Subway Station Into New Park

Green and purple are some of the colors straphangers will see when they head to the new Hudson Yards subway station when it opens.

The Metropolitan Transportation Authority released a video showing some of the aesthetic touches going into the extension of the 7 subway line to 34th Street.

As part of a new installation called "Arts for Transit," the MTA is turning four acres of the Hudson Yards into a new park above the subway station.

When it opens, commuters can go down one of two entrances to find two tile mosaics commissioned by the MTA.

Both have been finished and will be seen at the main entrance and the upper mezzanine of the station's dome.

Sources tell NY1 that the station will be ready for commuters by February 24.